XDA Recognized Developer luca020400 says that this feature needs updated cgroups (a Linux kernel feature), so it doesn't work on current devices. It could be a feature aimed at OEMs or it may be implemented on the Pixel 5.

Currently, virtual assistant apps typically send audio over the media volume stream, which is shared by other media apps. With the new stream, Android 11 should allow developers of virtual assistant apps to send audio over this new stream, letting users set the assistant volume independently of other media apps.

It seems like Google is working on an API for detecting single press, double tap, or triple taps of the volume keys. We've discovered two commits titled "support customization of volume keys" and "support customization of single/double/triple clicks," which point towards this undocumented change in Android 11. To enable the feature, long/single/double/triple key presses will be differentiated by the length of time and patterns of KeyEvents.

As a systems administrator, you've probably noticed that computer objects in Active Directory have a description field that is shown in the default view of the Active Directory users and computers MMC console. It's very rare to see an IT department that makes regular use of this field for something useful - never mind keeping it up to date!

Click on the Software Update button. This will open the Software Update system preference.

All that remains now is to add the VBScript to the user login script. I do this via GPO (User configuration > Policies > Windows Settings > Scripts > Logon).

I thought that it would be a good idea to automatically populate this field with the last user to logon to the computer object. With a slight tweak to our AD security and a little bit of scripting, it's quite easily achieved. I also added even more information to the field so I could see the system service tag and model number.

The feature makes use of the Deep Press API that uses an ML model to infer when a user is pressing more forcefully on the screen. In Android 11, you can now do a deep press on notifications in the notification panel to expand them.

Adding on to the enhancements made in Android 10, Google has made some improvements to the share sheet in Android 11. For example, the loading of icons is now cached, which means that they appear faster. Scroll jankiness has also been reduced by caching the itemViewType in the ViewHolder, caching the result of shouldDisplayLandscape to reduce the number of IPC calls while scrolling, and caching the work profile user handle.
