No issues on the areas where I used the KwikWood as filler. I've worked on projects trying to get automotive paint stuck to plastic, and let me tell you that this was nothing in comparison to that potential nightmare. A spot here and there is one thing with Duratex and is totally fixable because the texture hides the repair, but having to take a whole project back down to square one is a morale killer. Prep is always the #1 thing to get right when doing any kind of painting.

I find the latency (however small) of monitoring through a DAW is too disturbing. Especially on bass, but there is just some sort of emotional disconnect.

What's interesting about Durham's is that it's plaster based and came recommended multiple times over on a number of AV forums who use it on their speaker cabinets before a Duratex coating. No idea what caused it to not stick on specific spots. It had been several days since I had applied and sanded it. I ran 80 grit with the ROD sander over the entire surface and wiped it cleaned before I started. I've read some other interesting issues with inconsistent Duratex batches that had problems, but I don't think that's it. The KwikWood worked great since it's a bondo product. I will absolutely use spackle if I ever do this again.

I think people should stop being so concerned about if Amplitube, Guitar Rig or whatever sounds like the real deal or not, and instead focus on the sounds that can be produced by them. So what if it's not a perfect Marshall? Since when should electric guitars sound the same anyway? Electric pianos sounded nothing like the real deal but they turned out to be something else, something that people appreciate for what they are, and not for what they are not.

I finally figured out a halfway decent technique to get the remaining glue off of it, and I can't remember where I found it. I had tried to do it early on in the process but the glue was still way too thick. Once you get it down to where there is a layer that looks like wood left, use a thin scouring pad soaked in acetone and work it in small sections to where you can quickly wipe away the residue with a blue shop towel (you'll go through a lot of them as well as a lot of acetone). If you get your cabinet in some lighting where you can see some glare at a low angle you'll be able to spot leftover glue real fast. It's also very noticeable by touch because the wood is super smooth and the glue still has a light tack to it.

Amp modeling can work "ok" in situations where you are using it essentially as an extra eq to fill out a certain frequency range on a rhythm track, which is what some of the other posters have mentioned. The Ampeg SVX plugin, also, can work well for rounding out bass sounds in the mix. But for any lead piece that you want to stand out, forget about it.

The deceptive thing is, when you're sitting in your studio, and trying it out, you may be thinking, "well this sounds alright, yeah that sounds like a Fender Bassman would". But when you mix it, and send it out to people, the emotion of the music, which is supposed to grab and capture the listener will not happen in the same way.

I used both the KwikWood and the Durham's Rock Hard putty to fill in any dings, scratches or gouges. They are great products and I would recommend them both. The KwikWood is best for bigger dings where the Durham's is good all around. There were plenty of marks hidden under the tolex and I spent hours filling them all in and sanding it level.

Adobe Photoshop Elements 4.0

I'm going to give it a few days to cure. It's possible I throw one more coat on it to even some spots out, but we'll see.

After the KwikWood cured for a couple hours I used the detail sander with 80 grit to start leveling the spots I worked on. It sands like bondo or wood filler and looks like it's going to hold up really well. You definitely want a lower grit number to help take material off faster.

I think battery amps are very under-rated for tracking guitar parts. Because they don't need ac power or ground, they are immune from PSU and ground loop hum, and they don't radiate EMI for miles. They are low volume, for late night tracking sessions. And yet they can squeal with real feedback better than some full stacks.

I was inspired by several threads where members have taken an 810 or other similar cabs and have either replaced the tolex or have done a Duratex finish. I have zero experience with tolex, so I will be going the Duratex route since it looks to be far more manageable and something that I can easily do at home.

I went and invested into a random orbital sander, and while it helped to cut down some of the glue it didn't remove it completely like the acetone does. I still used it a lot and it will be perfect for the final sanding and lots of other projects.

BTW, if you want conformation about amp modelers work in songs, then I'll let you know that several bands use them for final recordings. Pop productions for sure, metal bands as well. And they can be quite picky about guitar sounds.

So I figured out that the best way to peel it off was pulling from top to bottom. I used a small hobby heat gun that gets fairly hot, and I discovered that it worked best at its highest heat. I was able to move it back and forth with the heat aimed on top of the tolex. It's was almost instant how quickly it let go once heat hit it.
