It comes down to an argument of trust - do you trust Apple, acting in their best interests, is sufficiently aligned with your best interests too? Or do you believe they're a malevolent entity? It's not feasible for an individual to maintain the list of trustworthy or untrustworthy parties that Apple does. No matter who you are, you will end up outsourcing this to someone - most users capable of running a security program that monitors for malicious apps (the same applies to most corporations, for that matter). This harkens back to the classic antivirus value proposition - the only reason legacy antivirus was of any value was because someone, somewhere, had to experience a virus first, and then report it to the antivirus vendor, who then would produce a signature. But replicating that on your own is infeasible: you need the crowdsourcing and the broad network to get these reports in early to respond. Or you simply buy this service from someone.

Overall, we liked Vipre well enough, but it doesn't beat any of the best antivirus software. Still, it's worth a look, though there is a hiccup with its telephone support. A macOS version is in Beta 3 testing, but it is only available for Windows for now.

As a security best practice, it is best not to install unsolicited applications on your cell phone. Last, like computers, cell phones are also susceptible to drive-by downloads in which the simple act of viewing a malicious webpage is enough to install malware on a cell phone. As is the case with desktop or laptop computers, it is good security practice to install antivirus software on your cell phone, especially if you frequently download apps. Antivirus software for cell phones has been available for some time, and many software vendors offering antivirus software for personal computers, such as AVG, Symantec, and McAfee, also make antivirus software for cell phones—sometimes even offering free antivirus apps. The same limitations discussed in Chapter 6 for personal computer antivirus protection apply to cell phone antivirus software as well; namely, antivirus software cannot detect a specific type of malware if it does not have the corresponding signature. Regardless of the cell phone service provider, cell phone model, or cell phone OS (operating system), cell phone users are as susceptible to phishing attacks in the same way as laptop-toting computer users. If a cell phone can open an email or text message or display a website, its user is susceptible to phishing attacks.

NortonLifeLock, as it's known since splitting off from Symantec, still offers one of the best antivirus software solutions with its 360 system.
