It's May 22, 1995, and you can't be home to watch the season finale of Melrose Place. Dr. Kimberly Shaw had pulled back her wig to reveal that enormous scar the previous season so you knew she was well on the road to doing something completely bonkers. And in one of the greatest moments in TV history, she didn't disappoint when she blew up the drama-filled apartment building. Clearly, you can't miss that, but in the pre-TiVo and DVR era, you had only one choice: Record it on your VCR. If you had set your VCR's clock correctly, if you had enough tape, and if you could master programming your VCR correctly, you could be away and still catch Kimberly press the button.

iPhone 12 Pro Ringtone for your device was never this better. This App is designed for Android phone & tablet, so app can work on any screen sizes.

I bought my first laptop in 1999 - a Dell of some sort that I ordered over the phone. Even then it felt obscenely heavy, but I could still carry it with me easily when I moved across the country for grad school. That wasn't the case with the desktop I had prior to that: a giant CRT monitor that took up most of my desk, the tower computer that I always hit my leg against, the connected, clickity-clackity keyboard that tilted up and the wired two-buttoned mouse that used a roller ball sensor instead of a laser. For storage, it had both CD and floppy disk drives and I could connect a cumbersome zip drive when I needed more space. And for my term papers, there was the noisy, grinding dot-matrix printer with those satisfying-to-tear-off perforated edges.

This is the worst phone I had ever purchased. Battery failure, heating problem, just LTE no VOLTE. When you go to the service center they asked you to change its parts and demands huge sum of money. Worst experience with Sony ever and not recommend anyone to go for Sony products.

I had one well into the 2010s, mostly because I never worked up the energy to get rid of it. But the cordless phone was one of humankind's great achievements when they first appeared in the 1980s. Forget the wall-mounted rotary phone or that wiggly cord that was always getting tangled - just pick up your handset and roam your house (remember this was a time where people actually talked on the phone). The digital answering machine - tape answering machines were disappearing by 1995 - let you screen calls.

Okay, to answer the question you're most definitely wondering, the Pelington is not as damaging as the almighty AX-50, but its range is certainly better. As the main Warzone map is massive, this could be the best weapon to use in any long-range situation.

Forget hanging it on the wall or putting it on a slim media center, your television in 1996 was a bulky cathode-ray tube model that was an absolute pain (often literally) to move. Though it's also somewhat true today with flatscreens, choosing your TV's size back then really depended on how big your living room was. Because if you went too big, your big screen might take up more space than your couch. On the upside, device convergence was showing up in some TVs by the mid-1990s. Maybe you had one with the TV and VCR all in one box?

If you didn't have an early cellphone - and sometimes even if you did - a pager (or beeper as they were called on TV medical dramas) was a way to show how popular or important you were. Today the whole process for using one feels as archaic as setting your VCR to tape Melrose Place (see below): Dial a number, wait for a beep, enter the phone number for calling you back and hope your recipient is both near a phone and cares enough to actually follow through with your request. Pagers also let us send an early form of text message by inputting numbers that would either be code for some phrases or roughly spell out others.

There's little doubt as to if the Pelington 703 is the best sniper in all of Call of Duty: Black Ops Cold War, and one of the best in Warzone. Although lacking in ammo capacity, the sniper does have higher damage, speed, and accuracy stats than the all-too-overrated LW3-Tundra. Here's how to get the most out of the Pelington sniper in both the multiplayer and battle royale.

Before MP3s and streaming and after much of the world had moved on from vinyl and LPs, we consumed music on cassettes and CDs (I'll leave a discussion about MiniDisc players for another time). You could invest in an expensive room-spanning stereo system, with multiple boxes for your receiver, the different components and your speakers, but the boom box was an attractive alternative for apartment dwellers, college students and people who didn't obsess over high-end audio equipment. It put all the stereo's parts in one box and you could carry it easily.

As part of CNET's 25th anniversary, we've spent the last month sharing with you how the internet, the technology industry and CNET itself have profoundly progressed over the last quarter of a century. But it's not just our online experience, the people driving it and the technologies powering it that have changed. The personal gadgets we use today barely resemble those from the mid-1990s, and most of them are now combined in our phones. So strap on your pager, grab your Game Boy and make sure your camera has enough film: We're taking a wistful and sometimes regrettable look back.

Of course, music could even be more portable than a boom box. The cassette-playing Walkman was running out of tape by 1995 to be replaced by the CD-playing Discman. To listen to your grunge tunes, you likely had a simple pair of foam-padded headphones with an adjustable metal band. And, of course, in these pre-Bluetooth days, the wire that connected your headphones to your Discman was always getting tangled in something. Other accessories you may have carried included a padded CD carrying case, that opened like a flip book, and an adapter shaped like a cassette that you plugged into your car stereo's tape deck. The only thing missing was a mixtape.
