Eighteen students traveled to Fiji for the chiropractic clinic abroad program during the summer 2021 term. The chiropractic clinic abroad program is an optional program for student interns in the clinical phase of their education. Fijians established highly developed societies well before arriving Europeans, and Fijian people represent a melting pot of indigenous Fijian, Indian, European, Chinese, and other nationalities. Fijian culture is a mixture of several cultures, predominantly Melanesian and Polynesian. Additionally, Fijian culture is a collectivist one, emphasizing the community and family. In rural areas, people do not pass others without saying a word of greeting. Those Fijians perceived as standing in a class above that of the average Fijian often receive special greetings.

And so far my biggest challenge I've had to overcome is dealing with people and language barrier. It's harder to get across points that you're trying to. And it's really refreshing to see that the people, they need your help, they want your help, and they're really willing to try and learn. But just that barrier of talking to them and actually being able to communicate clearing what you want them to do or what you're trying to do. Creates quite a—makes it difficult at times.

In the current study, students reflected on aspects of Fijian culture like patience, caring, community, and humility within their video journals and over the course of their stay in Fiji, they openly expressed the willing desire to integrate these attributes into their lives. In this manner, they not only recognized cultural differences, but found value in the assimilation of some of those cultural values into their identity, which supports existing literature.

Jack Mezirow developed the most widely known architecture for transformational learning, which is a 10-step transformational process. Empirical examination of Mezirow's model, however, has indicated that transformational learning doesn't always conform to a neat and tidy 10-step process, which spawned other theories of transformational learning. Pachamama Alliance, which engages in transformational learning in Ecuador and around the world, articulated a condensed, three-stage model of transformational learning based on Mezirow's model. Data coding occurred in accordance with the hallmark stages of transformation represented by this three-stage model.

I've had many, many different patients and all of them have expressed such sincere gratitude for the care that we have given them. That's just not something you see from your typical American patient; not that I don't love caring for them as well but the level of expectation is completely different from culture to culture.

First, data from the current study cannot speak to the actual effectiveness of the care delivered to patients, it can only speak to the interns' confidence when delivering the care perceived as necessary from the interns' vantage point. In the case of the current study, that the intern perceived care as either effective or not effective was more important than the actual utility of care delivered. In addition, interns speak about patient history, which is not verifiable; however, one aspect of the current study was to examine perceptions of clinical effectiveness and not actual clinical effectiveness.

But I've grown into a better person, more considerate, more patient, more flexible definitely. So, definitely a better me, a newer me. And I feel good about it. It's been great, a really good experience. And although things didn't go perfectly, that's what made this experience what it was and I would definitely want to do this again, come back to Fiji. Maybe not on Clinic Abroad but I'm definitely coming back to give back to this community because it's been absolutely amazing and life changing.

Additionally, by the second or third video journal entry, students (87/5%, 14/16) began making comparisons between American and Fijian cultures and engaged in critical thinking about assumptions they made of Fijian culture. Through such comparisons, they made conscious their unconscious cultural assumptions of Fiji, which hallmarks the second phase of transformative learning. For instance, students noted differences in the behavior of children between American and Fijian cultures as well as the level and types of patient gratitude towards them as healthcare providers. Students noted within almost every video journal entry the Fijians' appreciation and gratitude for the care that they had received. Many of the Fijians returned after care to give their student intern a small token gift of appreciation. Consider the following student interns' comments on Fijian gratitude.

Fijians have the eyebrow raised as a “yes” so you really have to actually pay attention to a lot of nonverbal cues which I think that in the United States we take that for granted so it’s actually helped me be much better about paying attention to the whole patient, not just what they are saying. How they are reacting, wincing, and carrying themselves. So that has been a learning experience.

Utilized MS Office/Open Office, Excel and Microsoft Word to document and maintain patient records

My energy level on a scale of 1 to 10 to entertain my kids is a 1. So I’ve decided that I need to put forth the effort and make this a summer of great memories by creating a summer bucket list. Now the list isn’t long – (ain’t nobody got time for that) but I did want to create a list that gave us great memories.

An event or an accumulation of events serves as the traditional disorienting dilemma and catalyst for change when those events and a person’s experiences conflict with their previously held worldview. During these events, the learner experiences “aha” moments that leads to their reflections and re-evaluations of previously held understandings and identity.

Which makes receiving one today even more meaningful. Make someone’s day and send one by downloading our printable encouragement notes.

The interns that participated within the current study demonstrated transformational learning with regard to their clinical skills, moving from a place of unconscious uncertainty about their own ability and skill when delivery chiropractic care into a position of strong clinical confidence. Also demonstrated within this study were interns’ intercultural transformations and an expanding shift in consciousness toward a much larger worldview from when they arrived in Fiji. These transformations in both confidence and intercultural awareness led to the interns’ development, or solidification of a professional identity as a Doctor of Chiropractic. Although unanticipated, this finding was significant.

I can be a Doctor of Chiropractic. My confidence grew so much while on my CAP trip.

I don’t know if it was from putting too many eggs in the water or boiling it for too long. It just became a hideous process. I could never get the perfect hard boiled egg. Not to mention when you were done peeling them, some would be so hard to peel. This oven baked hard boiled egg method, made it for easy peeling too.

Six-months after interns returned from the clinic abroad trip to Fiji, researchers contacted students to conduct a follow-up qualitative assessment of their Fiji trip. The Qualtrics survey opened in early December 2021 and closed in February 2021. Non-responding participants could have received up to four reminders to complete the survey.

Two of the authors thematically coded data, independently, and compared themes to reach consensus of emergent themes. The authors applied deductive reasoning to participant data, within the phenomenological framework, to confirm (or disconfirm) the theoretical underpinnings of transformational learning given the students' experiences.
