As others have suggested I would recommend just calling Microsoft. It is a very simple process, and they are very understanding.

I think that using a retail install disk for windows and an OEM product ID will not work properly and actually is illegal anyways. If the member calls Microsoft what they more than likely will do is sell a legal version with the proper product ID and that will solve the problem of having to by-pass the product activation.

Windows Key Finder works even if your computer is crashed or the Windows admin/user password is expired, forgotten, compromised or for any reason you are locked out of the computer.

Unlike cracks which have been floating around since Vista RTM was released in late November, this crack doesn't simply get around product activation with beta activation files or timestop cracks - it actually makes use of the activation process. It seems that Microsoft has allowed large OEMs like ASUS to ship their products with a pre-installed version of Vista that doesn't require product activation - apparently because end users would find it too inconvenient.

I recently formatted my computer and reinstalled Windows. However, I was forced to use my dad's disc, which is notably a few years older than mine, to install. I had lost my disc, but still had my serial code.

I have no need to change the product code; at least I shouldn't; while the disc I used was not mine, I still had my product code, that shouldn't be the issue. At this point, I'm thinking that calling Microsoft may be the best option.

My alternative is to either find my own disc (I've been searching for weeks to no avail) or activate it by phone. I would prefer not to have to call Microsoft. Another alternative I could think of would be to take my rig in to the shop which built it for me, and explain things to them. If I give them my serial code, is it possible they may be willing to do a format/reinstall with my code?

Something is not quite right about this story. If Vista was originally installed on the subject machine and then re-installed at a later time then it would activate okay. Did you use the original Vista disk (or Compaq's restore disk) to re-install Vista? When you spoke to MS did you tell them what had happened?
