Online Attacks In the first setting, someone actually tries to login with many different passwords. Most systems take a long time (in computer terms) to respond to a login — especially an incorrect login. This limits the effectiveness of this kind of attack. For instance, if it takes 2 seconds to get an "login failed" message, you can only try 30 passwords a minute. If you had an 8-character password, even if all characters were lowercase letters, it would take on average over 6,000 years to login successfully in this scenario. Moreover, unsuccessful login attempts are usually logged, so that even a mildly vigilant system administrator would be aware that someone was attempting to hack into the account after a few minutes of trying. Finally, many systems employ throttling, in which the server starts introducing longer and longer delays as the same user tries more and more logins within a brief period. In fact, often systems lock an account if there are too many unsuccessful attempts in a short period of time.

I have a script called cleangroup that I wrote to help clean up after people who have departed from our department (see "Clean Up NIS After Users Depart" [Hack #77]). It goes through our NIS map and gets rid of any references made to users who no longer exist in the NIS password map. It's a useful script, but because I created it myself there's really no reason that our two new full-time administrators would know it exists or what it does. So I created a new manpage directory, and I started working on my manpages for all the tools written locally that new admins would need to know about.
